THE COMMONWEALTH.

FRANKFORT.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 23, 1863.

We feel happy in announcing to our readers that, most probably, the Misses De Roche will favor us with one or two concerts next week. Most of our readers can but have read their praises in the many papers that have been filled with them. To such as are unacquainted with their reputation as artistes we would say, that we but echo the voice of all judges in classing Miss Eugenie as the best lady pianist in America. (As Willis says, "not only the best, but so far the best that no comparison with others can be thought of.") Her execution is wonderful; she has immense power, and with the most delicate taste and touch, Miss Marie has made herself in Louisville (where she resided for some months) a standing that no artistes has ever been able to reach. She is the favored singer of that appreciative, yet "hard to please" community. Her great forte lies in her very distinct pronunciation in whatever language she sings—throwing a pathos, fervor, and expression in her singing that few can equal. Due notice will be given of the exact time and place. The present notice is simply intended to give our readers an imaginative foretaste of the pleasure they may expect.

[From La Boz Do Chile. (Translation.)]

General William Nelson.

Very few who live in this forgetful but nobly-loving capital of Chile, can have forgotten the bold and martial figure of a young sailor, who was our guest during the festivals of 1856 and 1857, and whom we all, more or less, have known either in the anti-slavery saloons to which he had easy and brilliant access, or in the public promenades, where his magnificent and almost colossal figure attracted the gaze and admiration of the concourse. This remarkable man, then holding the rank of a simple lieutenant in the navy, was Major General William Nelson, who has just died in his own country, in a manner as tragic as lamentable, after having displayed in the terrible struggle now rending the American Union, the most extraordinary abilities as a soldier.

Moreover, William Nelson was the brother of the Hon. Thomas Henry Nelson, the distinguished and popular Minister of the United States, who, not only in his official character, but by his courtesy as a private gentleman, has received among us the hearty good will accorded, wherever he went, by his unfortunate brother. It appears to us, therefore, almost a hospitable duty to consecrate a few lines to the memory of the young hero who, so inopportune and so deeply regretted, has fallen at the outset of a truly wonderful career.

In tracing with hasty touches this sketch, we have availed ourselves of some of the newspapers of the United States, received by the last steamer. The latter consequently formed various military camps in the State, and recruiting sundry thousands of his fellow-citizens, opened the campaign against the Southern invaders, defeating them in many partial encounters, until the powerful army of Buell entered the State, destined to drive the rebels from her soil. Nelson organized his volunteers in a powerful division, which he himself commanded as Brigadier General, incorporating it with his forces.

will be conceived that Nelson was capable of performing this prodigy of strength, when it is remembered that he was not at that time, although only 33 or 34 years of age, of the weight of at least 250 pounds. At his death he weighed nearly 300.

Nelson notwithstanding his stature, was neither obese, nor was wanting in the agility or grace of an elegant. It is true that like Henry the 8th he broke down three or four horses in a day's ride; but after a gallop at Acre, or to the fig groves of the Catraze, we frequently found him an elegant and tasteful gentleman in the salle, where more than once, carried away by the spontaneousness of his disposition, he was seen to kneel before some lovely Chilean, to whom the dashing sailor swore a love as instant as the billows of his own element.

That which made Nelson most popular among us was that spirit of fun and good humor so characteristic of the Chileans, and of which the Americans of the North, so different from the circumstances English, are so willing to become pleasant abctors. Many are the amusing jokes remembered of Nelson. Upon one occasion he removed the hat of the servant in a pistol gallery at Valparaiso, by a well directed ball, plying him on the spot for the damage and the right with a handful of coin, for he was as accurate a shot as he was a finished gentleman. During a long residence at Acre, he took part in all the rustic sports of our country, it being his favorite amusement to "chase the herds" at the annual cattle hunt.

When at the close of 1857, Lieut. Nelson returned home, he bore with him many affectionate souvenirs which he loyally required, sending frequent letters and gifts to his friends. One of the latter possesses a beautiful rifle, which he sent him from Kentucky, where, as is well known, if they do not make the finest rifles, they have at least the finest riflemen in the world, as the English found to their cost at the battle of New Orleans.

While peace reigned over the great republic Nelson filled no commission of importance, after his return home. But scarcely had the rebellion which broke out in the Spring of 1861 begun, when he was called into active service, being entrusted with the chief command of the flotilla of gunboats which was to operate along the line of the Ohio. The fame enjoyed by Nelson as an artillery officer, rendered him most appropriate for those operations, whose results have been so astonishing in favor of the Union.

From the beginning of the war the State of Kentucky, by her central situation and her resources, was destined to be the theatre of great military operations, and her brave sons to play an important part in the struggle. Two men were presented to the Government as the most appropriate to arouse the energies of that warlike and forest-horn race—Major Anderson, who had fired the first cannon-shot from the casemates of Fort Sumpter, against the rebels, and Lieutenant Nelson, commander of the Ohio gunboat fleet—but natives of the State and both well known to her citizens.

Anderson was first named, but his health failing, was succeeded by Nelson, in his post of agitator of the people and recruiter of volunteers. The latter consequently formed various military camps in the State, and recruiting sundry thousands of his fellow-citizens, opened the campaign against the Southern invaders, defeating them in many partial encounters, until the powerful army of Buell entered the State, destined to drive the rebels from her soil. Nelson organized his volunteers in a powerful division, which he himself commanded as Brigadier General, incorporating it with his forces.

At the head of this brilliant body of men Nelson, performing prodigies of personal valor, decided the bloody battle of Shiloh, in which, without his opportune arrival, the Federal troops would have perhaps suffered a most irreparable defeat. Nelson was promoted to the rank of Major General for this famous deed of arms.

In consequence of his new promotion Nelson remained commander-in-chief of the forces of the State of Kentucky, and as such commanded in person at the battle of Richmond, undertaken against his order, and in which, notwithstanding he was wounded, he retired gallantly in the face of the enemy.

His wound scarce healed, finding Louisville, the capital of the State, threatened by an army of thirty thousand men, he hastened to its assistance, took command of the forces, displayed extraordinary energy, even to the secluding of the city till the women and children, and was preparing to take the field against the enemy, when, in the Court House, where he was stopping, the event occurred, which snatched him from life, which is known to all.

The press of the State of Kentucky, as well as that of the whole Union, is in mourning for the death of General Nelson, whom many writers call "an extraordinary man, for whom were open the most brilliant positions in the country." And it cannot be doubted—that there must have been something powerful and rare in the nature of the young soldier, who, from the rank of a simple naval officer rose, in the space of a single year, to the highest military rank in his country's gift, without awakening envy or censure, in a country where the press daily thunders against the incompetent or the favorite.

Upon the occasion of the solemn funeral ceremonies at the burial of the unfortunate Nelson, the popularity he had won was most emphatically manifested. His whole division, composed of more than twelve thousand men, escorted his coffin, and six Generals bore it upon their shoulders, and, strange to say, three of these perished four days later in the battle of Perryville, while saved Louisville, and in which Nelson would have taken so conspicuous a part.

And still more strange in this war of giants, where groups of young and brilliant Generals move from the borders of a comrade's sepulcher, and march to their own—that one of these—Brigadier General Jas. S. Jackson, who also died gloriously at Perryville, should have left, in one of the Louisville papers, the epitaph of his comrade Nelson in the beautiful words, worthy of the fallen hero and of him about to fall.

They are as follows, and with them we close this hasty sketch, which we trust to be permitted to offer to the family of Mr. Nelson in Chile, as a slight palliative to their most heartily affliction:

"Nelson is dead—mourn citizens of Kentucky, mourn. Your noblest son has gone from your midst. Weep, soldiers of Kentucky, weep. Your comrade in danger, your leader in battle, your beloved General, is no more—his equal you will never find again. Brave, chivalric, noble, and true, the idol of us all, where, oh where, shall we find another, whose voice is so cheering, whose steps so dauntless, whose eyes so keen, and whose heart so true as that of our lost, our gallant Nelson."

During his residence in Valparaiso, Nelson was accustomed to take part in the fox hunts, then greatly in fashion among the English of that port. Upon one of these occasions, the horse upon which an estimable young Chilean was mounted, fell in attempting to leap a ditch, crushing beneath him the body of his rider.

All supposed him killed, and, in order to obtain the victim, or rather his remains, it was proposed to shoot the horse. Nelson objected, stating that the dying throes of the animal might extinguish the latent spark of life remaining in his rider, and proceeded at once to tie, with a stout cord he wore, the four legs of the horse. Then making a superhuman effort, he lifted the animal sufficiently to allow the others to draw out the scarcely living rider, who thus miraculously escaped. It weep for Nelson; soldiers and heroes who bare stood unmoved amid the din of battle, who have bent not for the shrieking shell or whistling bullet, will bend their hearts in sorrow low and weep for Nelson. Who that saw his noble form at Shiloh will ever forget it? Who is it that remembers his heroism upon the plains of Richmond, when fighting for his native State, that will not weep for the fallen hero? Oh! Kentucky! what a loss is this!

"I have not wept before for many years, but when I think of the cruel fate that snatched my beloved General from me, I feel that tears of blood could scarcely wash my sorrow away. Earth never gave a truer friend, a braver general, or a more devoted patriot, than Major General William Nelson, of Kentucky. History will do justice to his character and to his fame, while his memory will live as long as true men breathe or soldiers bear arms."
